

TIPPING POINTS

SNAPSHOT OF A NATIONAL RECKONING, A YEAR LATER

Graphic by Heather Jones, reporting by Arden Phillips

In the last quarter of 2017, sexual assault in America reached a fever pitch. Spanning #MeToo, #TimesUp and #WhyIDidntReport, the 'Harvey Weinstein Effect' literally flooded the American consciousness almost every day following those allegations in early October. In the following three months, the U.S. saw over 150 accusations of everything ranging from rape to innuendo, across industries including Hollywood, sports, media, politics and more. While the national conversation and allegations continue, including countless others not in the public eye or ever reported, we are just now beginning to see the conclusion of some cases years later. On the anniversary of this watershed moment, here's a data visualization of the sexual assault storm of the last three months of 2017, and what resolve it has come to, if any.

The infographic represents allegations on the date noted. Of the above accused, their outcomes, as of the end of 2017:

Call The National Sexual Assault Telephone Hotline if you're being harassed 800.656.HOPE (4673)

Main graphic includes accusations Oct-Dec 2017. In cases of multiple accusers, an average of 3 are indicated. Outcomes may appear in more than one category. Does not take into account apologies, denials, or counter-accusations. SOURCES: The New York Times, Vox, NPR, The Daily Mail UK, BuzzFeed, The Washington Post, Bloomberg, The Los Angeles Times, The Hollywood Reporter, Time, Variety, ABC News, The O.C., The New York Post, CNN, Adweek, Huffington Post, WBUR, Eater, NFL arrest database, National Legal and Policy Center.